Defining Quality in Criminal Justice

Wednesday May 13, 2015, 9 am - 5 pm

Fitts Auditorium, Penn Law, 3501 Sansom Street, Philadelphia, PA 19104

Join the Quattrone Center for the Fair Administration of Justice at the University of Pennsylvania Law School to participate in a day of thoughtful discussion among prominent criminal justice practitioners, researchers and academics as we seek to define what a "high quality" system of criminal justice looks like, and how that definition can show a path to reform.

We expect our criminal justice professionals to do more than simply process cases. We see our prosecutors, defense attorneys, and judges as seekers of truth, ministers of justice, and providers of customized social solutions that will help each participant in the justice system – victims, perpetrators, and the community at large – benefit from personalized remedies that will address their needs as we provide justice for all.

While our expectations are clear, we lack a shared understanding of whether or how such a goal can be achieved. Are our criminal justice professionals providing high quality services to our communities? How do we know? What measures or observations would we use in answer to the question "Is my (judge/court/public defender/prosecutor) high-quality?" How could we – or should we – compare the administration of justice in jurisdiction x vs. jurisdiction y?

Using a unique discussion group format, we will share definitions of quality from the collective minds of some of our nation's most prominent criminal justice thought leaders, and engage the audience in in-depth discussions of what quality really means in criminal justice, and how we can know it when we see it.

Keynote Address:

Mark Moore, author of "Recognizing Public Value" and "Creating Public Value"

Mark H. Moore, the Hauser Professor of Nonprofit Organizations at the Harvard Kennedy School of Government, focuses on public management and leadership, civil society and community mobilization, and criminal justice policy and management. He studies how our public organizations can engage communities in supporting and legitimizing their work and in the role that value commitments play in enabling leadership in public sector enterprises. Dr. Moore was the Founding Chairman of the Kennedy School's Committee on Executive Programs, and served for 25 years as the Guggenheim Professor of Criminal Justice Policy and Management and Faculty Chairman of the Program Criminal Justice Policy and Management. His publications include Creating Public Value: Strategic Management in Government; Dangerous Offenders: The Elusive Targets of Justice; From Children to Citizens: The Mandate for Juvenile Justice; Beyond 911: A New Era for Policing; and Creating Public Value Through State Arts Agencies.

Lunch Keynote Speaker:

A. M. "Marty" Stroud III, Partner, Barham Warner Stroud, L.L.C.
