JLPA hosts Professor Sabeel Rahman: How Public Goods Provision Can Help Reshape Economic Inequality

Time: 12:00pm - 1:00pm

Location: Silverman 280

Professor Rahman will speak on how law and public policy constructs our systems of public goods provision, and how engaging these policy issues is central to our larger debates about inequality.

The Journal of Law and Public Affairs hosts Professor Sabeel Rahman from Brooklyn Law School, who teaches administrative law, constitutional law, and classes on law, inequality, and economic regulation. His academic research focuses on questions of democratic and participatory governance, public law, and economic policymaking. His first book, Democracy Against Domination (Oxford University Press, forthcoming) examines the tensions between economic regulation, new forms of private power, and ideals of democratic accountability in context of the financial regulation debate. His current research focuses explores the changing nature of inequality and economic opportunity, and the future of the social contract in this "New Gilded Age" of inequality and new forms of private power. He is also working on a series of papers on the crisis of American democracy, the role of social movements, and the prospects for more participatory and inclusive democratic governance.
