

WARRANTY.

Implied Warranty that thing sold by Maker is suitable for the purpose intended.—A bridge company having a contract with a railroad company to erect a bridge, and, having partially executed the same, made an arrangement with H., whereby the latter undertook, among other things, to prepare all necessary false work, and by a day named, and in the best manner, to erect the bridge then being constructed by the bridge company—H. to assume and pay for such work and materials as that company had up to that time done and furnished. The false work already done by the bridge company was defective, but its defects could not have been discovered by inspection at the time H. entered into this arrangement. Held, That there was an implied warranty upon the part of the bridge company that the false work it did, and which H. agreed to assume and pay for, was suitable and proper for the purposes for which the bridge company knew it was to be used: Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, S. C. U. S., Oct. Term 1883.
