

ment and the erection of a dwelling thereon. This implies a residence both continuous and personal. The settler may be excused for temporary absences, caused by well-founded apprehensions of violence, by sickness, by the presence of an epidemic, by judicial compulsion, or by engagement in the military or naval service. Except in such and like cases the requirement of a continuous residence on the part of the settler is invariable: Bofall v. Dilla, S. C. U. S., Oct. Term 1884.
