The 2016 presidential election has revealed numerous issues with the electoral process—from campaign finance laws that have allowed certain parties to disproportionately contribute to elections; to gerrymandered districts that have led to political gridlock and polarization; to voter ID laws that have prevented many from voting in the first place. Although the election has sparked a national debate over these issues, they have touched down closer to home, in Philadelphia, as well. Join the Democracy Law Project as we analyze how the 2016 election has affected Philadelphia, and what we can do, as both Philadelphians and Penn Law students, to take action.
