The automation of government decision-making by artificial intelligence is no longer a theoretical concern. As legal and technical experts continue to wrangle with fundamental questions about how machine learning impacts democratic governance, policymakers are actively implementing A.I. initiatives in the public and private sector. They must not only grapple with conceptual questions about fairness, transparency, and efficiency, but also with more practical concerns about navigating the political process. How can political leaders be convinced of the value of digital advances in government? What are the roadblocks to more widespread adoption of machine learning and other digital advances in government? This workshop will bring together scholars who will speak to the challenges of implementing machine learning and digital innovations in government. This is the final workshop in a series of three dedicated to exploring challenges raised by the use of artificial intelligence by governmental institutions.
